

HARLEY WEIR

b. 1988, Surrey, UK. Lives and works in London, UK.

One of the most celebrated photographers of her generation, Harley Weir is an image-maker that continually subverts the expected. Known for the intimacy of her images carefully composed with a highly attuned sense of colour, material and composition, she is known across her personal, commercial and editorial work in the fashion industry for radically reshaping ideas of womanhood and how the female gaze might be engaged with and made new in our current era. Her artworks - often using both analogue and digital techniques with experimentation in the darkroom and in post-production - combine her signature visual intensity and freedom with mysterious and unguarded subjects. The resulting images evoke a world familiar to us and filled with emotion, yet suggestive of a darker and more compulsive sense of our place within it. A world in which the body is turned inside out, in which images take on an unnamed agency and where the transformative effects of desire, anger, ecstasy and turmoil leave an indelible mark on our gaze. Through her personal work Weir has sought to increase awareness around social issues such as plastic waste, the rights of refugees, marine conservation, and therapeutic support for young people, among other issues.
